PG&E: Creating a Pool of Skilled Energy Job Applicants

Pacific Gas and Electric Company (PG&E), one of the largest combination natural gas and electric utilities in the United States, employs some 20,000 persons to provide energy services for 15 million users over 70,000 square-miles in northern and central California. Like many in the energy industry, PG&E is concerned about finding work-ready applicants. The emergence of green energy technologies for which neither incumbent nor new workers are prepared complicates its search. To help individuals in its nearby communities acquire the skills for jobs in the energy and utilities industries, PG&E and its partners launched the PowerPathway™ program to cultivate industry-informed career pathways into such jobs. PG&E created a partnership with local Workforce Investment Boards (WIBs) and community colleges to supply pre-employment services by providing customized, skilled craft training.

NSF Funding Opportunity: Computing Education for the 21st Century

The National Science Foundation (NSF) has announced a funding opportunity under the (Computing Education for the 21st Century \(CE21\)) program, with $15 million to support 13 to 20 grant awards per year. Community colleges are among the eligible applicants. Full proposals are due March 13, 2013. Please access the full program solicitation for more information on the CE21 program and guidelines for eligibility, preparation, proposal submission, and deadlines.

REPORTS AND STUDIES

From Jim Stone, Director of the National Research Center for Career and Technical Education (NRCCTE) on “Heal the Academic-Vocational Schism” The Chronicle of Higher Education (September 10, 2012): Mike Rose has written extensively about work and vocational education over the years. In this essay [Rose] discusses postsecondary education, but I think his thoughts have resonance at the secondary level as well--and could even be viewed as a way to philosophically ground programs of study as more than a mechanistic approach to moving more kids to college and work. The process of integrating curricula has largely taken place as Rose describes---for example, much of our work on integrating math, literacy, and science here at the NRCCTE fits his definition. But what if we thought about curriculum integration as flowing the other way? Imagine a school in which students in culinary arts study historical foodways in their social studies classes, students studying automotive technology learn about the art and science of vehicle design, students in cosmetology take on the history of fashion, and so forth.

Comments from Chuck Wiseley: I am currently reading Rose's book "Why School" and thoroughly recommend it. I already have "The Mind at Work: Valuing the Intelligence of the American Worker" and his newest book "Back to School" referenced in the article. I believe he understands the challenges students and faculty face and articulates strategies to overcome the barriers of contextualization and academic-vocational integration. I heard him speak at last year's student success conference and he is a fantastic speaker if you're looking for one for an upcoming conference.
